Technology, innovation and "industrial redesign" of traditional clinical models are critical components for creating viable, sustainable solutions that address the global healthcare cost crisis. As healthcare systems around the world struggle for actionable approaches to controlling costs and driving better outcomes, the pace of adoption of innovative solutions is ramping up across the global healthcare ecosystem and is reaching a tipping point which is driving market penetration and value creation.

COVID-19: A GLOBAL HEALTHCARE TRANSFORMATION ACCELERANT

The global economic and viral pandemic stretched the U.S. and global healthcare system to a breaking point. It shed light on global vulnerabilities, dramatically raising the cost of being unhealthy, and quantifying the priceless benefits of health, diagnostics, and preventative care. Key themes driving the healthcare transformation investment thesis are to: keep high risk patients out of the hospital; deliver affordable, rapid, accessible diagnostics for all; diversify, control and localize the medical supply chain; leverage technology, automation, digital access and telemedicine alternatives; use real world evidence to inform decision making; and write and/or erase regulations and CPT codes based on what best serves the need and the demand today. Companies small and large are moving quickly to try to decode and solve problems and create solutions and deliver affordably at scale. Those best positioned to deliver innovative technologies, strong balance sheets, and/or access to capital will thrive and grow more quickly.
